Can you try to explain to yourself what "story marketing" is? To learn story marketing, you must first know what it is! You think about it, and after several corrections, you should be able to say something similar: "Packing products through stories makes the product image better, making it easier to be remembered and discussed by the public, and finally achieve the purpose of increasing sales."

There may be some differences in vocabulary, but the meaning should be the same. They all believe that stories can add points to products, stories are easy to spread, and stories can carry emotions.

If you think this is not clear enough, you decide to check the definition of story marketing on the Internet. You may find a description similar to this: "Story marketing is a marketing model that uses stories as a carrier to package goods and prompt customers to act. Customers describe them through story contexts. Looking forward to the future, touching inner emotions, and inspiring lofty ideas, so that story values or product images can last forever, and even trigger dissemination and discussion."

The above is my integration and rewriting of various definitions of story marketing on the Internet. If you take the exam, this definition should help you score. But is there a more simple and understandable statement that allows us to clearly know how to do story marketing?
