An idyllic New Forest village has all but been taken over by an evil but clever and grasping solicitor who has devious plans to develop the area into a ghastly theme park. Only a few private properties remain, the Doctor's house and the ancient furniture shop that has been owned by the Purkiss family since the time of William Rufus. However, the business is failing and the solicitor Clive Orvid sees a chance to achieve his goal of establishing his own private modern fiefdom. On Orvid's instigation the council levy a punitive tax on the business and there seems there is no alternative; Julie and her Dad will have to sell up and move to the city. With her dad in despair, Julie Purkiss steps in and decides that the time has come to make claim to an ancient right, a droit granted by King William Rufus as he lay dying on a charcoal burner's cart in 110 AD. The King granted a Droit Sagittaire to Julie's ancestor as a last desperate act to redeem his soul. There is a scrap of linen written in Royal blood, hidden for centuries. However this was Norman Law, and though enraged by the resistance to his plans, Orvid determines to use his considerable skills to test the law and disprove the claim.
