Before this letter reaches London the guns will have awakened both the echo of the old river Po and the classical Mincio. The whole of the troops, about 110,000 men, with which Cialdini intends to force the passage of the first-named river are already massed along the right bank of the Po, anxiously waiting that the last hour of tomorrow should strike, and that the order for action should be given. The telegraph will have already informed your readers that, according to the intimation sent by General Lamarmora on Tuesday evening to the Austrian headquarters, the three days fixed by the general's message before beginning hostilities will expire at twelve p.m. of the 23rd of June.

- The Third Italian War of Independence was a war between the Kingdom of Italy and the Austrian Empire fought between June and August 1866. The conflict paralleled the Austro-Prussian War, and like that war, ended in an Austrian defeat, with Austria conceding the region of Venetia to Italy. Italy's acquisition of this wealthy and populous territory represented a major step in the process of Italian unification.

- Without the alliance with Prussia, the Italians may not have achieved so much. Their quest for unification would have been even more delayed. The Prussians would prove to be again of help to the Italian's during the Franco-Prussian War. Due to their victory over France, any situation in the Papal States was no longer an excuse for foreign intervention, thus leading to its integration to the whole of Italy.
- Without a collective effort, the Third Italian War of Independence would not have been successful. Not just between Italians and Prussians, but also between Italian men of prominence such as Giuseppe Garibaldi, Count Cavour and King Victor Emmanuel II, who sometimes varied in their political inclinations.
