The Thrill of the Hunt

One of the primary drivers for modern-day treasure hunters is the thrill of the hunt. Searching for buried treasure, whether in a remote natural setting or within the confines of a bustling city, ignites a sense of adventure and discovery that few other pursuits can match.

Unraveling the clues left behind by those who came before is a puzzle that challenges the mind and tests the limits of determination. It is this combination of physical and mental exploration that makes treasure hunting so enticing.

Additionally, the possibility of uncovering historical artifacts and items of great value adds a tangible contribution to the thrill. The idea that one could stumble upon a relic from the past that holds significant historical and monetary worth is a driving force for treasure hunters.

Types of Modern-Day Treasure Hunting

Modern-day treasure hunting takes various forms, each with its own unique challenges and rewards.

Metal Detecting

Metal detecting is one of the most popular forms of treasure hunting. With a metal detector in hand, enthusiasts comb beaches, forests, and fields in search of buried artifacts and lost valuables. From ancient coins to military relics and antique jewelry, the possibilities are endless.

Not only does metal detecting offer the possibility of finding valuable items, but it also provides a window into the history of a location. The discovery of a lone, rusty horseshoe can transport the treasure hunter back to a time when horse-drawn carriages roamed the streets.

Shipwreck Diving

For those who prefer a more aquatic adventure, shipwreck diving provides an opportunity to explore the depths of the ocean in search of hidden treasures. Sunken ships, some of which date back centuries, hold the promise of untold riches.

Shipwreck diving requires specialized training and equipment, as well as a passion for historical research. Every wreck holds its own story, and piecing together the past through underwater exploration is a fascinating endeavor.

Urban Exploration

Urban exploration, also known as urbex, involves exploring abandoned buildings, tunnels, and other man-made structures. While not traditionally associated with treasure hunting, urbex enthusiasts often stumble upon forgotten relics and hidden gems.

Exploring derelict buildings, such as old factories or mansions, can lead to the discovery of forgotten safes or secret compartments. It is these unexpected surprises that make urbex an increasingly popular way to satisfy the treasure hunter's instinct.

Treasure Hunting Etiquette and Legalities

While the allure of modern-day treasure hunting is undeniable, it is essential for enthusiasts to follow ethical guidelines and comply with local laws and regulations.

Preserving historical sites and artifacts is crucial in ensuring their continued exploration by future generations. Responsible treasure hunters adhere to a "leave no trace" policy, taking care to leave the site as they found it and reporting any significant finds to the appropriate authorities.

Additionally, researching and abiding by the legal requirements of the area being explored is essential. Many countries have laws in place to protect cultural heritage and regulate the excavation and sale of historical artifacts.

The Joy in Uncovering History

While the possibility of finding valuable treasures may be a significant motivator for treasure hunters, the true joy lies in uncovering history. Each discovery, whether it be a centuries-old coin or a forgotten family heirloom, adds a piece to the puzzle of our collective past.

Treasure hunters are not merely hunters of wealth; they are also explorers, storytellers, and preservers of the past. Their passion for the unknown fuels their quest, and the knowledge gained from each find contributes to our understanding of the world we inhabit.

Let the Treasure Hunt Begin

I treasure hunted on occasions with a dear friend of mine, who made a career out of searching for buried treasures. In 1997, he asked me if I would publish a book for him about hunting for a modern day buried treasure. His offer came as a complete surprise to me.

One afternoon in May 1998, as I sat with him in the back yard, he gave me a history lesson on his career in treasure hunting. At the end, he told me he had two places picked out to bury two treasures that might start a gold rush in North America.

In the summer of 1999, he planned to bury a treasure somewhere in the US worth $150 million and a second treasure worth another $150 million in Canada.

He had no immediate family to leave his fortune to and came up with the idea of a modern-day treasure hunt.

I could see that he had given this idea a lot of thought, from looking into the legal aspects to working out all the details and finally coming up with a code to hide the real clues. When I first read his manuscript, I was amazed. He not only had coded clues, but he had an alternative method for those who were clueless about codes. That second way meant one could literally sit at their computer and use global maps on the Internet in an attempt to close in on the location.

This book contains two different methods to track down the treasure.

First: Solve the Code, which will let you find the clues, and then you have to figure the clues out. This method is very precise and requires concentration and thinking. In the end, it will get you to within two miles of the treasure. At that point it becomes a traditional treasure hunt.

Second: Use the global maps. This method requires searching through thousands of pictures. If you can locate all the pictures, it will get you into the ball park, but then it requires a lot more random searching.
