Juno Robbins wants to be a normal kid. So when creepy Dr Longchamp follows her, asking if her Dad, an archaeologist, has dug up anything interesting recently, Juno runs for home. But Dad isn't there and doesn't come back as promised in a note he's left her, along with an ancient blade. Juno just knows he's in trouble and that she has to find him before anyone else does, even if that means visiting Professor Newby at the local museum and, even worse, a Bronze Age stone circle.

But Newby and Longchamp are secretly working together, and want that blade at whatever cost. Juno walks into their trap at the stone circle and, in her struggle to get away from the doctor, something happens and everything changes. Juno knows time travel only happens in books, so how come the stone circle look like it's just been built, the blade is shiny and razor sharp, and Lif, the girl who appears from nowhere and snatches her blade, is wearing a sack for a dress? Everything's just like the pictures in Dad's archaeology books.

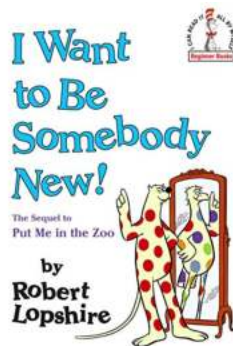

At least Dad's here too, according to Prys, the village outcast. The bad news is that someone called Senion is holding him prisoner, someone Prys never wants to see again. Juno has only 24 hours to find and rescue her Dad before he becomes a human sacrifice.

It isn't going to be easy with Lif and Senion in her way, not to mention Dr Longchamp, who's determined to make it back to the 21st century and ensure Juno and her Dad get stuck in the past. With only Prys to help and her intuition that the legend of the blade is her way out will Juno ever see home, civilisation and television again?
