Since we last met Dan Turner in The Deadly Curse of the Gold of Toulouse, he has finished his Middle School years and is enjoying his last summer holiday before going to the International Lycée. His parents have done the dirty on him (as parents will) and moved to a town in the back of beyond called Eauze. This is mainly because his mother, an ancient historian, was enchanted by the place as it is home to a recently discovered fabulous cache of Roman treasure. In order to continue his bi-lingual education and stay with his friends, Dan is obliged to live with his friend Jean-Michel Vernier during the week as his new home is too far from his school. During his holiday, Dan sets himself the task of discovering why the treasure had been buried and left undisturbed since antiquity. Meanwhile, we are introduced to the Libo family who lived in Eauze in the 3rd century AD. They were the owners of the thousands of coins and lovely jewellery which was hidden and never retrieved and as the story unfolds, we begin to understand why they left it behind. Will Dan discover the truth? Will he survive his first year of Lycée? The story continues.
