The Hidden Wonders

One of the hidden wonders of the Great Plains is the Konza Prairie Biological Station, located in Kansas. This preserve offers visitors an insight into the untouched beauty of the tallgrass prairie ecosystem. With well-maintained trails weaving through picturesque landscapes, hikers can immerse themselves in the untouched serenity of this unique environment.

Another hidden gem lies in Nebraska – the Sandhills. This vast region is home to the largest sand dune formation in the Western Hemisphere, spanning over 19,000 square miles. A little-known fact is that the Sandhills contain the most significant natural wetland complex in the United States, fostering an astonishing diversity of plants and wildlife.

Untouched by Time

The sparsely populated regions of the Great Plains harbor a wealth of historical sites that have remained untouched by time. One such place is the Cahokia Mounds State Historic Site in Illinois. This UNESCO World Heritage site is home to the ancient remnants of a once-thriving Native American city. Explore the vast mounds and step back in time to the pre-Columbian era.

Further west, in the state of Colorado, lies the Great Sand Dunes National Park and Preserve. These awe-inspiring dunes, shaped by the wind, stand proudly against the backdrop of the Sangre de Cristo Mountains. A visit to this national park is like stepping into another world, where the untouched beauty of the sand dunes is truly awe-inspiring.

Experiencing Authentic Wildlife

The Great Plains is not only home to breathtaking landscapes but also a myriad of wildlife species. While pronghorns, bison, and prairie dogs are well-known inhabitants of the region, encounters with rarely seen creatures can lead to unforgettable moments.

The black-tailed prairie dog, for instance, is a social animal that lives in complex networks of burrows. Found primarily in the grasslands of the Great Plains, watching their playful activities from a safe distance can add a touch of wonder to your journey.

In May 1995, with nothing but a backpack and a vague sense of disquiet, Patrick Dobson left his home and a steady if deadening job in Kansas City, Missouri. Over the next two and a half months he made his way to Helena, Montana, letting chance encounters guide him to a deeper sense of who he was and where he was going. His chronicle of this journey charts his experiences with the seldom-seen people of the small towns, the far-flung outposts, and the Great Plains that make up “our America.” Beginning as a seeker, Dobson becomes a faithful recorder of other people’s search for contentment, introducing us to a firefighter with a farm at the end of the world, a fiery Christian conservative, a man sharing a van with a crowd of cats, a former circus carny who’s found the secret to living life, and a homeless Native American offering a special and enduring gift. Ridden out of a hostile Kansas town, sniffed by bears, confronted by bison and recalcitrant moose, Dobson cannot help but see how land, sky, weather, and a world of circumstances influence people. Against the majestic sweep of the open plains and endless horizon, his story is one of hope and desperation, richness and simplicity—a portrait of who we are in the heartland of America.
