Written as a 'Folktale for Grown-Ups', The Sun at World's End offers a revised retelling of the traditional Norse Viking saga about the end of the world, and the beginning of another. Told across many generations of firesides, this is a tale for people facing unprecedented challenges - to offer a guiding light out of the shadows. Sometimes you need to hit rock bottom before you can rise again, more splendid than ever. Told as only The Man From Story Mountain can.

It follows a traditional Viking saga about how Balder the popular, playful sun god dies (an act of Loki, God of Mischief and God of Fire). With Balder's golden glow gone - cast by the sun maiden Sol - the foretold end of the world in the Battle of Ragnarok slowly draws nearer and finally commences. There are journeys to the heavens and the underworld and back again.

Many positive spirit moral-threads are woven throughout the telling - not least that even immortals come to their end; forever never lasts because time isn't real - only change is real, it touches all things, eventually ending even the immortals.

Yet out of the silence when all of creation has succumbed to the void, new life unfolds with fragrant forests - and from their moss springs Life (the first woman), and Longs For Life (the first man). All of life returns including a new Balder and a new Sol. And a new Rainbow Bridge, called Bifrost, translating as The Bridge Of Bridges.

This is an ancient saga rekindled, a story whose time is ripe for the retelling - to harness new strength and vigor in the souls of those who feel almost fallen. It lends wisdom and hope when living in a world tottering on the sharp blade of sudden changes.
