In Cyprus the way you order coffee can get you into trouble, as even coffee is political. But not for the author and her group of friends from both sides of the divide, who don't want to colour themselves as either Greek or Turkish, but as Cypriots.

They are the Traitors' Club, traitors because they are friends and because they have a goal that others don't seem to have – to live together. Through playful banter over coffee in an Ottoman courtyard in the divided capital, Nicosia, they share their moving, funny yet sometimes harrowing experiences, having lived through anticolonial struggle, internecine fighting, war, partition and endless, ineffective peace negotiations, in what has become known as 'the Cyprus problem'.

From the author's idyllic life growing up in an island with the potential of being a paradise to her desperate flight in the face of war, this memoir shows what it is really like to live in Cyprus with the unresolved political problem colouring your life.

Reviews:
