These small creatures have evolved to display vibrant shades of red, blue, green, orange, and yellow, warning predators of their potent toxins. This combination of beauty and deadly defense mechanisms makes them a truly remarkable species.

Throughout history, indigenous tribes in these regions have utilized the toxicity of these frogs to coat the tips of their hunting darts. This practice gave these amphibians their common name, "poison dart frogs." However, it is important to note that not all species of dart frogs possess lethal toxins.
