The Power of Titanic Poetry

When trying to encapsulate the immense emotions and stories within the Titanic, many poets have turned to verse. Titanic-inspired poetry has managed to beautifully capture the essence of the ship, its passengers, and the events that unfolded. The rhythmic flow of words carries readers through the heartache, bravery, and hope that characterized the Titanic's ill-fated voyage.

One notable Titanic poem is "The Conquerors" by Joseph Conrad penned shortly after the disaster. Conrad's evocative words transport readers back in time, allowing them to relive the tragedy and the shifting tides of emotion surrounding the event.

The heat was fierce, the flames high condemned never to see the sky With pride he served out his time aboard Titanic's White Star Line

A Belfast stoker born and bred He shovelled coal with first class abed He toiled among the fiery depths they walked above taking fresh sea breaths

Southampton's port was a welcome rest and he went ashore dressed in his best His thirst was such that it wasn't finished By his first, his second or third pint of Guinness

He took too much he will admit and slept so long he missed the ship How could he know that his behaviour was something that became his saviour

Some days later, he read the news Titanic lost on its maiden cruise Fifteen hundred souls lay dead
His wife's admonishments left unsaid

Adam Stephenson
