A Glimpse into the Wild West

The Wild West, also known as the American Frontier, was an era of lawlessness and untamed adventure. Cowboys and outlaws ruled the vast expanses of the western territories, seeking their fortunes and leaving behind a legacy of both bravery and infamy. During this period, the Wells Fargo stagecoaches emerged as vital lifelines, transporting passengers and their precious cargo, navigating treacherous landscapes, and facing the constant threat of bandits.

Amidst this unforgiving landscape, one man stood tall, wielding his trusted revolver like an extension of his arm - John Pope Western. Born out of the fierce crucible of the Wild West, his name became synonymous with justice, as he embarked on a relentless pursuit of lawbreakers and protectors of the innocent.

John Pope was a fast-rising 1880s detective with the San Francisco Police Department. His career changed when Jim Hume saw him stop one Wells Fargo robbery and solve another. The famous Chief of Detectives for Wells Fargo hired him immediately.

Pope, raised by the last of the mountain men, might have worn a suit and bowler hat, but his .44's were fast and deadly and his investigative techniques flawless.

He solved train and stage robberies, embezzlements and pursued fugitives all over the West.

In Prescott, he met a beautiful former Pinkerton named Sarah Watson. She had been one of America's first female detectives. He recruited her – crime solving and shooting abilities equal – they became an unstoppable force for good.
