The Time Machine

"The Time Machine"

'The Time Machine' was written by H.G. Wells, a 19th Century biology teacher as well as a professional writer and journalist in 1895. The story is mainly based on what was happening in the 19th Century during the 'Industrial Revolution', where there was a big difference between the Rich and the Poor. The rich did simply nothing but benefited from the poor suffering. The poor worked as labourers in factories and mills which were owned by the rich people. During this time the Theory of Evolution by Charles Darwin had been published. The theory was that humans had evolved from apes, which caused much controversy. The story highlights what was happening during the time H.G Wells was alive.

The book is about a scientist who invents a time machine which he uses to travel in time. He travels 800 000 years into the future. His name remains unknown and he is referred to as the 'Time Traveller' throughout the book. As he travels in time he finds a nightmarish dystopia, in which humanity has separated into two different species. The rich, who lived luxurious lives in the 19th Century, were now the Eloi. They were extremely beautiful but very lazy and unintelligent people. They live in beauty, peace and idleness. Whilst living with these people the 'Time Traveller' also realised that the Eloi were weak and childishly afraid of the dark.

The reason they were afraid of the dark was because in deep tunnels below their paradise lurked another race descended from humanity, the Morlocks. The Morlocks were creatures that evolved from the poor labourers who hardly got to see any light. They worked inside the tunnels which were subterranean and provided the Eloi with everyday wear and

How do historians represent the past? How do theatre historians represent performance events? The fifteen challenging essays in Representing the Past: Essays in Performance Historiography focus on the fundamental epistemological conditions and procedures that serve as the foundational ideas that guide all historians in their endeavors. Unified by their investigations into how best to understand and then represent the past, this diverse group of scholars in the field of theatre history and performance studies offers insights into the abiding issues that all historians face in the task of representing human events and actions.

Five primary ideas provide the topics as well as the intellectual parameters for this book: archive, time, space, identity, and narrative. Taking these as the conceptual framework for historical research and analysis, the essayists cover an expansive range of case studies and problems in the historical study of performance from the Americas to Africa and from Europe to India and China. Considering not only how historians think about these concepts in their research and writing but more pointedly—and historiographically—how they think with them, the essayists demonstrate the power and centrality of each of these five ideas in historical scholarship from initial research to the writing of essays and books.

Performance history has a diversity of identities, locations, sources, and narratives. This compelling engagement with the concepts essential to historical understanding is a valuable contribution to the historiography of performance—for students, teachers, and the future of the discipline itself. Expanding upon its classic predecessor, Interpreting the Theatrical Past: Essays in the Historiography of Performance, this exciting new collection illustrates the contemporary richness of historical thinking and writing in the field of performance history.
