From the book's preface :

have been travelling to London for many years, mainly for business. Most times it was Ashford and Slough near Heathrow, where our offices were; seldomly I came to London itself, but I knew the place from these few times relatively well. I could easily place the known venues on a map, in other words. I have never visited any musea in London though, other than a gallery in the Barbican where I visited a Martin Parr exhibition with my daughter (then photography student) early 2000s and the National Portrait Gallery at Trafalgar Square for a Mario Testino exhibition of humongous pictures of the late Lady Diana and some other Royals. We even had snacks at the refurbished roof top with a view of London from above.

This time over, I planned my trip around the British museum and Tate Modern. It's been a gap in my culture not to have ever seen the so-called Elgin Marbles (Brits prefer this name to 'Stolen Parthenon Marbles') and after visiting the Acropolis in Athens countless times in my lifetime, I been for ever tempted to see what his Lordship stole from us two centuries ago, and brought to London to 'protect' it so it disant from the 'savage' and 'incompe- tent' Greeks, unworthy of maintaining their own treasures. I shot hundreds of pictures of anything Greek in the museum and stayed in their exhibition halls for some time, observing and videoing tourists staring at the marbles. They even stole a Caryatid for crying out loud. As a token of mutual respect they should, as the least, return that one back to the Akropolis Museum in Athens. You can't just go some place and steal someone's national heritage treasures, and disconnect indeed the indigenous from their past! This is something only senseless religious fanatics like the Taliban do. Not civilized Europeans.
